

Food Delivery on Campus

Authors: Kristina Vigna, Bryson Turner, Nazaye Tilley, Jobert Vego

Problem Statement

Many students on campus want their food delivered to their dorm room, and allowing delivery can make student's lives so much easier and can help eliminate those long lunch lines.

Who is experiencing this problem?

The ones experiencing the problem are the on-campus students.

What is the problem?

The UofSC campus is very large with many food options spanning across the campus. The preferences, schedules, and distance from many food options is different for every individual student that lives on campus. The problem also is that while GrubHub is used to offer a "faster service" to students, the service that is provided isn't always processed and made at a speed that makes the food available to students faster than that if they were in line.

Where does the problem present itself?

The problem presents itself on campus specifically within dining halls and in housing around the UofSC campus.

Why does it matter?

Due to time restrictions between classes, many students are in need of having food delivered to their dorms. This is especially the case right now during the pandemic. Many students have hybrid classes which make time restrictions even tighter, and many students are also weary of going outside of their dorm for food because they feel they are at risk for the virus.
